History

Founded in Toulouse shortly after the Second World War; aimed at the relief of Spanish political prisoners, former political prisoners in German concentration camps and refugees from Spain; started a campaign in 1947 for the relief of a group of republican Spaniards, consisting of aviators in training and sailors, who were left in the Soviet Union in 1939 and imprisoned in 1941; sent to concentration camps in 1942, where they found themselves in Karaganda in Kazakhstan, forced to do agricultural labour under hard conditions; the campaign by the FEDIP led to a mitigation of their confinement, but they were not released until 1954-1956; moving spirit of the campaign was José Ester Borrás (1913-1980), who was secretary general of the FEDIP from 1947 until his death; more than once Ester intervened successfully in favour of persecuted opponents of the Franco regime in Spain and of refugees in France, who were threatened by expulsion.

INTRODUCTION

The Federación Española de Deportados e Internados Políticos (FEDIP) was founded in August 1945 in Toulouse and was transferred to Paris early 1947. FEDIP aimed at the relief of Spanish political prisoners, former political prisoners in concentration camps and refugees from Spain. FEDIP started a campaign in 1947 for the relief of a group of republican Spaniards, consisting of fighter pilots in training and of the crew of vessels, such as the Cabo San Agustín, which transported arms and was located in the harbour of Odessa in April 1939. Although the crew members said they had planned to depart for Mexico, they remained in the Soviet Union until June 1941, when they were arrested and sent to forced labour camps in Siberia. Several died of the hardships there. From 1942 onward they were in Karaganda (Kazakhstan), where they worked the land. Food and sanitation were poor, the work hard, the climate rough and contact with the outside world non-existent. Many suffered from tuberculosis.

Prisoners from other countries who were released after 1946 publicized the fates of these people, including some Jewish women from Austria who had become involved with the Spaniards and even borne their children in the camp.

When FEDIP learned of their existence, the staff verified their details with relatives and labour organizations and determined that they were anti-fascists and members of the UGT and the CNT. The subsequent campaign brought about some minor improvements in their situation and permission for them to send mail via the Red Cross, but was unsuccessful in obtaining their release. In March 1956 the military tribunal of the Council of the Supreme Soviet finally ordered that they be set free.

José Ester Borrás (1913-1980), general secretary of FEDIP, was the driving force behind the campaign. A former soldier in the Spanish Civil War, he had joined the French resistance. More than once Ester also intervened successfully in favour of persecuted opponents of the Franco regime in Spain and of refugees in France, who were threatened by expulsion. For more documents concerning FEDIP see also the papers of José Ester Borrás, available at the IISH.

The archives were received by the IISH in 1998 and consist mainly of documents concerning FEDIP's campaign for the relief of the interned Spaniards in Karaganda. The archives contain correspondence with the Red Cross, the United Nations (UN), political and labour organizations in France, the French government, the Spanish government in exile and wellknown personalities in France and elsewhere, files on the imprisoned Spaniards in the Soviet Union, including family correspondence and other letters and birth certificates of children born during imprisonment, documentation on Karaganda, the USSR and other documentation.

Periodicals were transferred to the library and photographs were transferred to the audiovisual section of the IISH.
